Acrididae (characterized by short horns), esp. Ecdipoda migratoria (or Pachytelus migratorius), the Migratory Locust, well known for its ravages in Asia and Africa, where, migrating in countless numbers, it frequently eats up the vegetation of whole districts. Bible they are rendered sometimes 'locust', sometimes 'beetle', 'grasshopper', 'caterpillar', 'palmerworm', etc. The precise application of the several names is unknown. Bald locust: in Lev. xi. 22 used to render the Heb. šōlām, because the Talmud states that this word meant a locust with a smooth head.

Napier does not explain his view of the literal meaning of logarithmus. It is commonly taken to mean 'ratio-number', and as thus interpreted it is not inappropriate, though its fitness is not obvious without explanation. Perhaps, however, Napier may have used λόγος merely in the sense of 'reckoning', 'calculation' (cf. LOGICUS).

One of a particular class of arithmetical functions, invented by John Napier of Merchiston (died 1617), and tabulated for use as a means of abridging calculation. The essential property of a system of logarithms is that the sum of the logarithms of any two or more numbers is the logarithm of their product. Hence the use of a table of logarithms enables a computer to substitute addition and subtraction for the more laborious operations of multiplication and division, and likewise multiplication and division for involution and evolution.

The word is now understood to refer only to systems in which the logarithm of any number a^x is x , a being a constant which is called the base of the system. The logarithms (of sines) tabulated by Napier himself were not logarithms in this restricted sense, but were functions of what are now called the Napierian (also Neperian, hyperbolic, or natural) logarithms, the base of which, denoted by the symbol e or ϵ , is 2.71828... This system is still in use for analytical investigations, but for common purposes the system used is that invented by Napier's friend Henry Briggs (died 1630), the base of which is 10; the Briggsian or Briggian logarithms are also known as common or decimal logarithms. For binary, Gaussian logarithm, see the adj. Logistic logarithms (see quot. 1795); also called proportional logarithms.

In mathematical notation 'the logarithm of' is expressed by the abbreviation 'log' prefixed to numeral figures or algebraical symbols. When necessary, the base of the system is indicated by adding an inferior figure: thus 'log₁₀ a ' means 'the logarithm of a to the base 10'.

-loger (lɔʒə), the ending of a few words which are virtually adaptations of actual or assumable Gr. words in -λόγος (L. -logus): see LOGUE, -LOGY. The oldest of these is astrologer (14th c.); it is uncertain whether this was f. L. astrolog-us + -ER (in which case it is an unusually early example of atype of derivation after derivatives common), or whether it was f. astrology + -ER (cf. the similar formation of astronomer, astronomer). On the analogy of this word, -loger was applied in a few instances to form personal designations correlative with words in -logy, -logic(al), as in chronologer, †geologer, †philologer (obsolescent), †theologer (horologer is of different formation). The suffix is no longer a living formative, being superseded by -LOGIST.

1. The branch of philosophy that treats of the forms of thinking in general, and more especially of inference and of scientific method. (Prof. J. Cook Wilson.)

The proper scope of this department of study has been and is much controverted, and books on 'logic' differ widely in the range of subjects which they include. The definition formerly most commonly accepted is 'the art of reasoning'; for various modern definitions see the later quots. At all times the vulgar notion of 'logic' has been largely that it is a system of rules for convincing or confounding an opponent by argument.

In the Middle Ages logic (or DIALECTIC, q.v.) was one of the three sciences composing the 'trivium', the former of the two divisions of the seven 'liberal arts'.

-logic (lɒdʒɪk), -logical (lɒdʒɪkəl), endings originally occurring in adaptations (through F. and L.) of Gr. adjs. in -λογικός, derived from adjs. and sbs. in -λογος, -λογον, which have derivative nouns of quality or function in -λογία, represented in Eng. by -logy. As the meaning of an adj. in -logic(al) may with substantial correctness be rendered by 'pertaining to —logy', such adjs. are commonly apprehended as derivatives of the related sbs. (as if f. —logy + -ic). In general, the existence of a sb. in -logy now implies the potential existence of a correlative adj. in -logical (the exceptions being confined to a few of the older words, such as apology, which have corresponding adjs. of different formation). For the difference in meaning between adjs. in -logic and the (now much more frequent) adjs. in -logical, see -ICAL, and cf. the note under GEOLOGIC 1.

† Logos (lŏg'gōs), Theol. and Philos. [Gr. λόγος word, speech, discourse, reason, f. λογ-, ablaut-variant of λεγ- in λέγειν to say.] A term used by Greek (esp. Hellenistic and Neo-Platonist) philosophers in certain metaphysical and theological applications developed from one or both of its ordinary senses 'reason' and 'word'; also adopted in three passages of the Johannine writings of the N.T. (where the English versions render it by 'Word') as a designation of Jesus Christ; hence employed by Christian theologians, esp. those who were versed in Greek philosophy, as a title of the Second Person of the Trinity. By mod. writers the Gr. word is used untranslated in historical expositions of ancient philosophical speculation, and in discussions of the doctrine of the Trinity in its philosophical aspects.

1816 EARL STANHOPE in Hansard Typographia (1825) 477 I have deemed it advisable to contrive a new pair of composing cases...introducing a new set of double letters [these were on, of, to, re, an, th, in, se;] they were not printed as ligatures, which I denominate logotypes; and rejecting altogether the double letters ff, fi, fl, fh, fi, fi, formerly occupying room in the cases, but used so seldom that [etc.]. 1880 Printing Times 15 Feb. 41/2 The use of logotypes does rather enhance than lower the cost of printing. 1892 Fall Mail G. 22 Jan. 3/2 Are the Corean letters or logotypes as numerous as the Chinese?

Logue (lŏg), the form assumed by the Gr. -λογία, -λογία in adapted words (most of them through Fr.), as analogue, catalogue, dialogue. The words with this ending which are designations of persons (in most instances preter, actual or assumed Gr. compounds of -λόγος 'speaker, discourses'), and related to parallel formations in -logy) are now little used, derivatives in -loger, -logist, or -logian being commonly preferred. Examples are Assyriologue, astrologue, ideologue, philologue, Sinologue, theologue.

2. The heartwood of an American tree (Hæmatoxylon Campechianum) used in dyeing; so called from being imported in the form of logs.

It is used to some extent in medicine as an astringent. The alleged use of logwood in colouring spurious or adulterated port wine was at one time a frequent subject of jocular allusion.

b. Used as sb.: A heavy fish.

1897 R. KIPLING Captains Courageous 61 'He's a logy. Give him room accordin' to his strength', cried Dan. 'I'll help ye. 'No, you won't', Harvey snapped, as he hung on to the line. 'It's my first fish'.

-logy (lɒdʒi), earlier written -logie, an ending occurring originally in words adapted from Gr. words in -λογία (the earliest examples, e.g. theology, having come through F. -logie, med.L. -logia). These Gr. words for the most part are parasynthetic derivatives; in some instances the terminal element is λόγος word, discourse (e.g. in τετραλογία tetralogy, τριλογία trilogy); more commonly it is the root λογ- (ablaut-variant of λέγ-, λέγειν to speak; cf. Logos). In the latter case, the sbs. in -λογία usually denote the character, action, or department of knowledge proper to the person who is described by an adj. or sb. in -λόγος, meaning either '(one) who speaks (in a certain way)', or '(one) who treats of (a certain subject)'. Hence the derivatives in -λογία are of two classes, (1) those which have the sense of 'saying or speaking', examples of which are the words anglicized as battology, brachylogy, cacology, dittology, eulogy, palilogy, tantology; and (2) names of sciences or departments of study. As the words of the last-mentioned class have always a sb. for their first element, and o is the combining vowel of all declensions of Gr. sbs., the ending of these compounds is in actual use always -λογία, becoming -ology in Eng. The names of sciences with this ending are very numerous: some represent words already formed in Gr., as theology, astrology; many represent formations which might legitimately have existed in Gr., as geology, zoology, psychology; others are of hybrid composition, as sociology, terminology, insectology. The modern formations in -logy follow the analogy of Gr. formations in having o as the combining vowel; exceptions are petrology (an incorrect form which some writers prefer to petrology because it shows the derivation from πέτρα rock, not from πέτρος stone) and mineralogy (F. minéralogie) which may be viewed as a contraction for mineralology*. The suffix -ology is freely used in the formation of humorous nonce-wds., some of which are illustrated below. All the modern formations in -logy may be said to imply correlative formations in -logical and -logist; in the case of some of the older words, the related personal designation ends in -loger or -logian. (Cf. -logue.) Hence Logy nonce-wd. = ology.

WFlem. lutteren, Efris. litteren, of similar meaning. For the development of sense cf. the fig. uses of loose, unsteady. The sense which the word has in Eng. has not been found in Du. earlier than the 16th c., but may be much older in slang use; the word was prob. introduced into England by foreign 'loiters' or vagrants. The same root is found in MDu. lutsen to wag about.

The diphthong in the first syll. is a substitution for the unfamiliar vowel of the Du. word, which was prob. ō (as in mod. pronunciation) or nearly so.

In the first qt. below, the form loilrande may be genuine; if so it represents a distinct word, f. the root of LOIL v.

For examples of the OF. and med.L. terms see J. M. Manly in Harvard Studies Philol. & Lit. I. (1892) 88 ff. The main difficulty is that these terms appear, whenever their sense can be determined, to mean the octave of Pentecost, or Trinity Sunday. Prof. Manly, however, points out that there is evidence that 'Pentecost' was sometimes used for the season beginning at Easter and closed by Whitsunday, so that the transference of the name 'close of Pentecost' from Trinity Sunday to Whitsunday, though lacking direct evidence, is not improbable. 13. a. Phonetics and Prosody. Applied to a vowel (in mod. use also to a consonant) when its utterance has the greater of the two measures of duration that are recognized in the ordinary classification of speech-sounds. Also, in Prosody, of a syllable: Belonging to that one of the two classes which is supposed to be distinguished from the other by occupying a longer time in utterance. (Opposed to short.) Long mark: the mark (—) placed over a vowel letter to indicate long quantity.

In Greek and Latin metre, a syllable is reckoned long (1) when it contains a long vowel or a diphthong, and (2) when its vowel is followed by more than one consonant (to the latter rule there are certain exceptions). A short syllable is conventionally supposed to occupy one time-unit (morae) in utterance, and a long syllable two. The distinction between the two classes of syllables, with criteria nearly identical with those of Gr. and Latin, is recognized in the prosody of many other peoples; in Skr. the equivalents of 'long' and 'short' are used of vowels only, syllables being classed as 'heavy' and 'light'.

Various inaccurate uses of the terms long and short were formerly almost universal in Eng., and are still common. (1) The vowel of a 'long' syllable, if 'naturally' short, was said to be 'long by position'. (2) By a confusion between the principles of quantitative and those of accentual verse, the stressed syllables, on the periodical recurrence of which the rhythm of English verse depends, were said to be 'long', and the unstressed syllables 'short'. (3) In ordinary language 'the long a, e, i, o, or u' denotes that sound of the letter which is used as its alphabetical name, while 'the short a, e, i, o, or u' denotes the sound which the letter most commonly has in a stressed short syllable (in the notation used in this Dictionary, respectively a, e, i, o, u).

He is also said to be 'long' when he holds a good deal. Mod. Newspaper. The spinners had gone heavily long, and consequently did not need to buy except in very small quantities. Long, obs. form of LONG; aphectic f. ALONG.

— long (lɒŋ), † longs suffix, forming advs. The earliest instance is endlong, from ON. endlangr adj., 'extending from end to end', 'the whole length of'. The word is properly a compound of LONG a.; but in Eng. it was principally used as adv., and developed the sense 'end-wise', 'end foremost', so that it became parallel in meaning to words like sideling, headling, backling. The ending -long thus came to be regarded as a variant of -LING suffix 2. Hence, on the one hand, the occasional 14th c. form endelyng for endlong, and, on the other hand, the substitution of headlong (s. sidelong), flatlong for the earlier headling (s. sideling), flatling (s. sideling).

9. intr. To have the appearance of being; to seem to the sight. (This sense when used of persons often retains some mixture of the notion of 1 c.) Const. a predicative sb. or adj., or a predicative adv. (as well, ill = 'in good, bad health').

b. with adv. of manner († or advb. phrase) : To have a certain look or appearance.

This use is often indiscriminately condemned, but is justly censurable only where look is virtually equivalent to seem, so that it requires a predicative complement and not a qualification of manner. (So, e.g., in quot. 1645) Owing, however, to the prejudice excited by the inaccurate use, look now rarely occurs with advs. of manner other than well, ill, badly. In some early instances the apparent adv. may possibly be an adj. in iv 1.

Loop (lūp), sb. ¹ Forms: 5-6 loupe, 6 loppe, 6 lowpe, 7 loupe, loppe, 7-loop. [Of obscure etymology.]

Prof. Skeat (Concise Etym. Dict.) suggests that the word may be a. ON. lūp, hlanp LEAPS, comparing the Sw. lūp-knut, Da. lūp-knude, lūp-kie, running-knot. The compounds, however, seem to be merely modern Germanisms; the relevant sense of the verb, Sw. lūpa, Da. lūbe, being app. foreign to early Scandinavian, and due to the influence of the corresponding G. laufen (L.G. lūpen). Further, the mod.Sc. form of ON. lūp would be regularly loup, pronounced (loup), whereas the word loop is in Sc. pronounced (lūp); the spelling loppe in G. Douglas is ambiguous, but prob. represents (lūp); cf. druppe = droop. The Irish and Gael. lūb, formerly suggested by Prof. Skeat, presents at least a noteworthily resemblance of sound and meaning to the Eng. word.]

Loosestrife (lū's'stroif), Also 6 loose-, lous(e)strife, lostroife. [f. LOOSE v. + STRIFE sb.; a mistransl. of late L. lysimachia, also -machia, a Gr. Λυσιμάχιον, f. the personal name Λυσίμαχος Lysimachus, an application of the adj. Λυσίμοχος 'loosing' (i.e. ending) strife, f. Λέσσι, combining stem of Λέσσι to loose + μάχη strife.

The form Λυσίμαχια (found only in Pliny's Latin translation) would be correct Gr. for the action of 'loosing strife'. The misinterpretation of the word is ancient; Pliny, though stating that the plant was discovered by one Lysimachus, also says that oxen that are made to eat it are rendered more willing to draw together. Ancient writers mention two kinds of lysimachia, the purple and the yellow, the descriptions of which agree with the two plants referred to in 1 below. Modern botanists have appropriated Lysimachia as a generic name to the 'yellow loosestrife'.

1. The name for two common herbaceous plants resembling each other closely in growth (upright and tall) and habitat (margins of ditches and streams).

Lorchipe, -uppe, obs. forms of LORDSHIP.

laford, 2-4 laverd, (3 lavid, læverd), 3-4 lover (e), loverde, (4 lhoard, lorld (e), 4-6 lorde (4 gen. pl. lordene), 4, 6-8 lard (e, 4-lord. Also Sc. LAIRD. In exclamations 6 lard, 7-8 lawd, 8 laud, lurd; also LUD. [OE. hlāford, once hlāfweard (Ps. civ. 17; Thorpe's 'to half-wearde' is a misprint: see note in Gr.-Willek), repr. a prehistoric form hlāfward*, f. hlāf* (OE. hlāf) bread, LOAF + ward* (OE. weard) keeper (see WARD sb.).

In its primary sense the word (which is absent from the other Teut. langs.) denotes the head of a household in his relation to the servants and dependents who 'eat his bread' (cf. OE. hlāf-ēta, lit. 'bread-eater', a servant); but it had already acquired a wider application before the literary period of OE. The development of sense has been largely influenced by the adoption of the word as the customary rendering of L. dominus. The late ON. lǫrd is adopted from ME.

With regard to the etymological sense, cf. mod. G. hofherr, lit. 'bread-lord', an employer of labour. In the mod. Scandinavian langs. 'meat-mother' (Sw. matmoder, Da. madmoder, Icel. matmóðir) is the designation applied by servants to their mistress.

For the phonology of the OE. word see Bulbring At. Elementarbuch §§ 267, 411, 562. In the 14th c. the word became monosyllabic through the dropping of the intervocalic v and the crasis of the vowels thus brought into contact.]

13. As a prefixed title, forming part of a person's customary appellation. Abbreviated Ld., formerly † L. (pl. Ls.), Lo.

The rules now accepted for its use are as follows. In other than strictly ceremonial use it may be substituted for 'Marquis', 'Earl', or 'Viscount' (whether denoting the rank of a peer, or applied 'by courtesy' to the eldest son of a peer of higher rank); the word of, when it occurs in the more formal designation, being dropped. Thus 'Lord Hartington', 'Lord Derby', 'Lord Manvers', 'Lord Palmerston', may be used instead of 'The Marquis of Hartington', 'The Earl of Derby', 'Earl Manvers', 'Viscount Palmerston'. A baron (whether a peer, or a peer's eldest son known by the title of his father's barony) is always called by his title of peerage (either a surname or a territorial designation) preceded by 'Lord'; as 'Lord Tennyson'; if the Christian name is mentioned for distinction, it comes first, as 'Alfred, Lord Tennyson'. The territorial titles given by courtesy to judges in Scotland are treated like those of barons, as 'Lord Monboddo'. The younger sons of dukes and marquises have the courtesy title of 'Lord' followed by the Christian name and surname, as 'Lord John Russell'. These rules were, for the most part, already formulated in the 16th c., but were for a long time seldom accurately observed except by experts in heraldry.

In early use the prefixed title had most commonly the form my Lord (see 15) or the Lord. The latter survives in certain formal uses, and in the superscription of letters.

1455 Rolls of Parli. V. 332/2 William Bonville Knyght, Lord Boneville, his servautes and adheraunts. 15... *Ek. of Precedence in Q. Elis. a. Prefixed to a name or title. (c) Prefixed to a title of rank or office; now only vocatively, as in my Lord Mayor, my Lord Duke, my Lord Marquis.

b. Used separately. (a) As the usual polite or respectful form of address to a nobleman under the rank of duke, and to a bishop; also (now only by persons greatly inferior in position) in speaking of them. (b) As the formal mode of address to a Lord Mayor, a Lord Provost, and to the Lord Advocate (Scotland). (c) In courts of law used in addressing a judge of the Supreme Court (or, formerly, a judge of any of the 'superior courts' now merged in this); in Scotland and Ireland in addressing a judge of any of the superior courts.

The hurried or affected pronunciation prevalent in the courts of law has often been derivatively represented by the spelling my Lud or my'ud (see Lud).

[OE. losian, f. los LOSS, used almost exclusively intr. (sense 1); sometimes with indirect obj. in dative, as me losode hit = I lost it. The transitive use, which occurs twice in ONorthumbrian and appears in general use early in 13th c., seems to have arisen partly from interchange of function between the indirect obj. and the subj. where these were not distinguishable by case-form (cf. LIKE v., LOATHE v.), and partly from the perfect conjugated with be (OE. hit is gelosed = it is lost), which admits of being apprehended as passive. The later sense-development of the vb. has been influenced by the cognate LEESE v., with which it became synonymous, and which it in the end superseded.

The regular mod. Eng. pronunciation repr. OE. losian would be (lɔ'z); the standard Eng. pronunciation (lɔ'z) seems to be due to association with LOOSE v., which in some contexts (e.g. to loose hold) closely approaches this vb. in meaning. Many dialects have the phonetic fo m normally descending from the OE. vb. The Sc. form loss is prob. evolved from the pa. t. and pa. pple. losit.]

(rendering L. sors, portio) : OTeut. type hluto-m*, f. the wk. grade of the root hlaut-* (: hlaut- : hlit-) occurring in the str. vb. OE. hlōtan, OS. hlōtan, OHG. liogan (MHG. liēgen), ON. hlōta, to cast lots, obtain by lot. The precise formal equivalent of the Eng. word is not found elsewhere exc. perh. in OFris. hlōt (? neut.), MDu. lot neut. (also masc.), Du. lot neut.; but synonymous sbbs. from the same root appear in all the Teut. langs. From the wk. grade are, besides those already mentioned, OHG. (h)lug masc., ON. hlut-r, hlut-r masc. (MSw. luter, loter, Sw. lott, Da. lot), hlute wk. masc.; from the form hlaut-* are OE. hlūt, hlūt, hlūt masc. (: OTeut. hlauti-z*), Goth. hlaut-s masc. (rendering κλῆρος), OS. hlōt masc., OHG. (h)lōz masc. and neut. (MHG. lōz masc. and neut., mod.G. loos, los neut.); cf. also ON. hlaut fem., blood of sacrifice.

The Teut. word was adopted into the Rom. langs.: F. lot (whence lotir to divide, in OF. to cast lots), It. lotto game of chance, Sp., Pg. lot lot, Sp. loto 'lot' put up to auction. Probably some of the uses of the Eng. word are due to the influence of F. lot. The primary meaning of the Teut. root hlaut-* is uncertain. Schrader has suggested that it may have been formed by secondary ablaut from the wk-grade hlut-* (repre. pre-Teut. hlō-: see HOLT) in the sb. hluto-m*, the primary sense of which would then be the piece of wood used in casting lots. But this conjecture is very doubtful, and not free from difficulties.]

1. An object (app. usually a piece of wood) used in a widely diffused ancient method of deciding disputes, dividing plunder or property, selecting persons for an office or duty, etc., by an appeal to chance or the divine agency supposed to be concerned in the results of chance. The 'lots', each bearing the special mark of one of the competitors, were placed in a receptacle (in Homeric Greece a helmet); according to Greek procedure the vessel was shaken, the winning lot being that which fell out first; in Scandinavia (see Vigf. s.v. hlutir) the winning lot was drawn out by an uninterested party. In Eng. (exc. in rare modern instances, chiefly translations from ancient langs.) the word in this sense occurs only in the phr. to cast, draw († also lay, put, send, throw, warp) lots (or † lot); followed by on or upon, over, between, for (the object or objects concerned); also by inf. or indirect interrog. clause.

In genuine OE. idiom the vb. governing lot was weorpan to throw (see WARP v.); cf. G. das los werfen, los sortieren, Gr. κλῆρον βάλλειν. In ME. weorpe was superseded by the synonymous cast and throw. The OE. use of sendan is a Latinism, after mittere of the Vulgate. The only forms of the phrase that survive are to cast lots (arch.) and to draw lots (cf. F. tirer au sort), which is interpreted as synonymous with to draw cuts (Cur sb. 1).

The spelling lower (cf. flower) renders the word identical in its written form with LOWER, to bring or come down, and the two vbs. have often been confused: when said of clouds, lower (lowəɪ) to look threatening, has some affinity in sense with lower (lɔwəɪ) to descend, and it is not always possible to discover which vb. was in the mind of a writer.]

Low Churchman. [cf. High Churchman.]

A member of the Church of England holding opinions which give a low place to the authority and claims of the episcopate and priesthood, to the inherent grace of the sacraments, and to matters of ecclesiastical organization, and thus differ relatively little from the opinions held by Protestant Nonconformists.

The term, invented as an antithesis to High Churchman, was in the early part of the 18th c. used as equivalent to LATITUDINARIAN. Afterwards it fell into disuse, but was revived in the 19th c., when the designation High Churchman had obtained a new currency as applied to those who inclined to the theology and ritual of pre-Reformation times. In this later use, Low Churchman has for the most part been viewed as equivalent to EVANGELICAL, and has rarely been applied to members of the Broad Church School.

1702 Charac. Church-Man 18 He is for showing the Low Church Men in their own proper Colours. 1793 De Foe Short. Way Peace Misc. 463 We have had it Printed, with an Assurance I have wondred at, That the moderate Members of the Church of England, call'd Low Church Men, are worse than the Dissenters. 1798 Pheix II. Pref. 13 It shows the first rise of that party which were afterwards called Latitudinarians, and are at this day our 'Low Churchmen'. 1710 H. BRYANT Vind. Ch. WILDERBOER in A. R. Ashwell Life (1879) I. 314 Talking as your prominent subject, Baptismal Regeneration, and its side against Low Churchmen.

Hence Low-Churchmanism = Low-Churchism, 1829 [see HIGH-CHURCHMANISM].

the word was app. introduced as a name for the fur of the lynx; for a similar instance of an adjective becoming a sb., cf. MARTEN.]

The spelling lucerne (quot. 1662), if not a misprint, is conclusive evidence in favour of this derivation. Etymologists have usually supposed the word to be an alteration of the OF. lucerne, luserne, female lynx, a fem. of unexplained form corresponding to the masc. loup-cervier repr. L. lynx cervarius (Pliny) lynx, lit. 'stag-hunting wolf' (lynx wolf, cervarius adj. f. cervus stag). But this hypothesis does not account for the form of the Eng. word, nor can it be satisfactorily referred to the OF. loup cervin (as if L. lynx cervinus* = lynx cervarius) of which Godef. gives one example. Possibly there may have been in OF. a confusion between loup-cervier and an adopted Teut. synonym.]

Parallel adoptions of the LG. word are icel. lukka (14th c.), MSw. lukka, lykka (mod.Sw. lycka), Da. lykke. Probably it came into English as a gambling term; the LG. dialects were a frequent source of such terms in 15-16 centuries.

The ultimate etymology of MHG. gelücke (= OHG. geliuchi* = OTeut. type galukko-pm*) is obscure. So far as meaning is concerned nothing could be more plausible than Paul's view (Beitr. VII. 133 note) that the word is connected with G. gelingen (OHG. gilingan) to succeed, turn out well or ill, as G. druck pressure with dringen to press, schluck gulp with schlingen to swallow, ruck wrench with ringen to wrench. But morphologically this assumption seems quite inadmissible, and most scholars deny the existence of etymological affinity in any of these instances. Formally, the word might be cognate with Louk z' or u', or with G. locken to entice (OHG. locken) and the synonymous OHG. lucchen; but no probable hypothesis seems to have been formed to connect the meaning of the sb. with that of any of these vbs.]

[Early ME. lof, loof, app. a. OF. lof (Wace, 12th c.), later loof, used in sense 1 below. Senses 2-4 are common to various mod. langs.: F. lof, Sp., Pg. lo, Du. loef (whence LG. loff, G. luf, Da. luf, Sw. luf). The manner of their development is obscure, and it is uncertain whether they originated in Fr., Eng., or (most prob.) Du. Sense 5 is peculiar to Eng., and it is not easy to connect it with any of the other senses.

Certain other meanings which the word has had in Du. and Fr. need to be accounted for before any hypothesis as to the primitive meaning and sense-development can be regarded as satisfactory. In early mod. Du. loef, loere is explained as 'hole-pin' (scalum, Kilian). In the 17th c. the F. lofor or loo is stated to mean 'the distance from the mast to the place on the side to which the sheet is fastened when the vessel is close-bauled'. (See the quot. from Nicot in Godef., s.v.) In the existing uncertainty as to the primary meaning, the ultimate etymology remains obscure; the current view that it represents a Teut. word cogn. with ON. lofe palm, Loof sb., depends on the doubtful assumption that the 'lof' of sense 1 was a steering paddle.]

It is curious that the word first appears as a rendering of the (at that time) like-sounding Sp. lonja slice of ham, LUNCHON, commonly believed to be a derivative of lunch, occurs in our quots. 12 years earlier, with its present spelling. In sense 2 lunch was an abbreviation of luncheon, first appearing about 1829, when it was regarded either as a vulgarism or as a fashionable affectation.]

Luncheon (lʌnʃən), Also 7 lunchen, lunch-

ion, lunching, 7-8 lunchin, 8 lunshin. [Related in some way to LUNCH sh.²

The ordinary view, that the spelling lunching represents the etymological form, appears somewhat unlikely. In our quots. the earliest form is luncheon, and this appears in our quots. earlier than lunch; and there is no evidence of a derivative verb in the 16-17th c. It is possible that luncheon might have been extended from lunch on the analogy of the relation between punch, punchion, trunch, trunchion.]

2. Originally, a slight repast taken between two of the ordinary meal-times, esp. between breakfast and mid-day dinner. The word retains this original application with those who use dinner as the name of the mid-day meal; with those who 'dine' in the evening, luncheon denotes a meal (understood to be less substantial and less ceremonious than dinner) taken usually in the early afternoon. Now somewhat formal: cf. LUNCH sh.² 2.
